INTRODUCTORY COMMENT

John Paul Stevens*

Many of us have both personal and professional reasons for commemorating this vintage year in the history of what I still think of as the Illinois Law Review.\(^1\)

My father was a student at the Northwestern University School of Law when the first issue of the Review was published in 1906. Approximately forty years later, I made my first attempt to understand the Sherman Act in an unsigned Comment on a topic that Professor Nathanson had suggested to me.\(^2\) It was in the Law Review office that the coeditors-in-chief of Issues 2 and 3 of Volume 42—whom the faculty had decided to sponsor as law clerks for Chief Justice Vinson and Justice Rutledge—flipped a coin to determine which vacancy each would seek.

My professional interest in the Review cannot be separated entirely from my personal experience. Familiarity with the educational function that is performed by work on the Review is an important reason why I regard law review experience as significant evidence of professional qualification. Memories of the independent attitude that was associated with law review research and writing enhances my confidence as a reader of today’s scholarly output. The Review—and I refer not only to Northwestern’s but also to the select few of comparable quality—plays an essential role in the legal process, not merely as a training ground for future professionals, but as a critic of the lawmaking process and as a source of ideas and inspiration as well. Indeed, in a true sense, it is a source of law.

Knowing that old friends for whom I have the greatest admiration will be contributors to this issue, I especially welcome the opportunity to participate in this written celebration.

---

* Associate Justice, Supreme Court of the United States.

1 The Review was known as the Illinois Law Review from its creation in 1906 until 1952, when it received its present name. The name-change and other aspects of the Review’s history are ably discussed in MacChesney, An Old Tradition—The Same Review—But a New Name, 47 Nw. U.L. Rev. iii (1952), and The Northwestern University Law Review, 1906-1956, 51 Nw. U.L. Rev. 2 (1956).
