is no longer present as he is not concerned with trying to aim at a certain point. He will steadily increase the pressure on the trigger so that his let-off should be perfect. His temptation to make the gun go off by putting sudden pressure on the trigger is removed because he is not anxious to make it go off at any certain point on the target. And he will then be a good shot."

Several pages of chronological bibliography on pistol and revolver shooting would no doubt be of interest to a collector who desires to obtain all the available literature on the subject, but there is little else to recommend this book to the average shooter.

A short but interesting introduction to the book was written by Lee E. Echols of the National Rifle Association, who is no stranger to shooters over the Nation.
