Spring 2000

The Unclearly Established Rule against Unreasonable Searches and Seizures

Brian H. Chun

Follow this and additional works at: https://scholarlycommons.law.northwestern.edu/jclc

Part of the Criminal Law Commons, Criminology Commons, and the Criminology and Criminal Justice Commons

Recommended Citation
THE UNCLEARLY ESTABLISHED RULE AGAINST UNREASONABLE SEARCHES AND SEIZURES

I. INTRODUCTION

In Wilson v. Layne, the Supreme Court unanimously held that law enforcement officers violate the Fourth Amendment when they allow members of the media to accompany them into a private home during the execution of a search warrant. The Court declared that such actions on the part of law enforcement officers are unreasonable. Nevertheless, the Court held that the officers in Layne were entitled to a defense of qualified immunity because the violated right was not "clearly established" at the time of the violation. According to the Court, a reasonable law enforcement officer could have believed, at the time of the violation, that she was not violating any law by allowing the media into a private home during the execution of a warrant.

This Note argues that the Supreme Court correctly held that federal and state law enforcement officers violated the Fourth Amendment when they allowed two members of the media to accompany them into the petitioners' home. This intrusion upon the petitioners' privacy was unreasonable because the media presence went beyond the clearly stated bounds of the warrant. This Note also argues, however, that the Court erroneously held that the law enforcement officers in Layne were entitled to a defense of qualified immunity. The law was "clearly established" at the time of the violation such that a reasonable officer should have known that the actions at issue in

---

2 Id. at 1699.
3 Id. at 1701. This was an 8-1 decision with Justice Stevens concurring in part and dissenting in part.
4 Id.
5 Id. at 1697.
this case would constitute a violation of the well-established principles of the Fourth Amendment.

II. BACKGROUND

A. THE FOURTH AMENDMENT: NO UNREASONABLE SEARCHES AND SEIZURES

The Fourth Amendment to the United States Constitution provides that:

The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated, and no Warrants shall issue, but upon probable cause, supported by Oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched, and the persons or things to be seized.6

The protection guaranteed in the Fourth Amendment is much older than the Amendment itself and is rooted in the common law of England.7 Semayne's Case, perhaps the most cited English case in this context, is famous for the statement that "the house of every one is to him as his castle and fortress, as well for his defence against injury and violence, as for his repose."8 This sentiment is echoed in subsequent English cases9 as well as in William Blackstone's Commentaries on the Laws of England.10 While the Supreme Court has never held that the Fourth Amendment protects a zone of privacy generally, it has made clear in a long line of cases that one of the central purposes of the Fourth Amendment is to protect a zone of privacy within the home from unwarranted and unreasonable government intrusion.11 To hold that there has been a violation of the Fourth Amendment, a court must find that there was government action,12 that there was in fact a search or seizure,13 and that the

---

6 U.S. CONST. amend. IV.
7 Layne, 119 S. Ct. at 1697.
12 Burdeau v. McDowell, 256 U.S. 465, 475 (1921) search or seizure was unreasonable. As the first two elements are not at issue in this case, this Note will focus on the third requirement.

A search or seizure can be unreasonable in a number of ways, with perhaps the most obvious being a warrantless search without probable cause. Even with a warrant, however, a search can still be unreasonable. In Bivens v. Six Unknown Named Agents of the Federal Bureau of Narcotics, the Supreme Court stated in a footnote that the Fourth Amendment requires that an officer executing a search warrant stay strictly within the bounds set by the warrant. Five years later in Andresen v. Maryland, the Court warned that responsible officials must assure that searches and seizures "are conducted in a manner that minimizes unwarranted intrusions into privacy." Thus, the Court began to make clear the proposition that a warrant alone would not suffice to make an intrusion into the privacy of a home reasonable. In Arizona v. Hicks, the Court held that police actions in the execution of a warrant must be related to the objectives of the authorized intrusion. Similarly, in Horton v. California, the Court held that "[i]f the scope of the search exceeds that permitted by the terms of a validly issued warrant or the character of the relevant exception from the warrant requirement, the subsequent seizure is unconstitutional without more."

Thus, unless otherwise specified by the warrant, police officers may not allow third parties to enter a home if the officers

---

20 Wayne R. LaFave & Jerold H. Israel, Criminal Procedure § 3.3(b), at 140 (2d ed. 1992). ("The probable cause test... is an objective one; for there to be probable cause, the facts must be such as would warrant a belief by a reasonable man.").
22 Id. at 394 n.7.
24 Id. at 482 n.11.
26 Id. at 325.
28 Id. at 140.
do not need third-party assistance.\textsuperscript{24} Such an action would be unrelated to the objectives of the authorized intrusion and would therefore be in violation of the Fourth Amendment.\textsuperscript{25} In \textit{Bills v. Aseltine},\textsuperscript{26} which was decided only five weeks before the events at issue in \textit{Layne} occurred, the Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit held that law enforcement officers violated the Fourth Amendment when they allowed a security guard to enter the plaintiff's home to perform a search that was not authorized by the search warrant. The warrant at issue authorized a search for narcotics only and the security guard was not present for the purposes of aiding in this search.\textsuperscript{27} Significantly, the holding in \textit{Bills} finds support in a federal statute which details the persons authorized to serve a search warrant.\textsuperscript{28} That statute, under the heading "Persons authorized to serve search warrant," provides:

\begin{quote}
A search warrant may in all cases be served by any of the officers mentioned in its direction or by an officer authorized by law to serve such warrant, but by no other person, except in aid of the officer on his requiring it, he being present and acting in its execution.
\end{quote}

Thus, the presence of the security guard violated the Fourth Amendment because the purpose of his presence was not to aid the officers.\textsuperscript{30}

\section*{B. QUALIFIED IMMUNITY GENERALLY}

Once a person's rights under the Fourth Amendment have been violated, the next step for a court is to determine the remedy.\textsuperscript{31} In most cases, the person whose right is violated is a criminal defendant and the remedy is typically brought about through the use of the exclusionary rule.\textsuperscript{32} In a civil case, however, in which a plaintiff brings an action against government

\begin{footnotesize}
\begin{itemize}
\item \textsuperscript{24} Bills v. Aseltine, 958 F.2d 697 (6th Cir. 1992).
\item Id.; see also Horton v. California, 496 U.S. 128 (1990); Arizona v. Hicks, 480 U.S. 321 (1987).
\item Id.; see also Arizona v. Hicks, 480 U.S. 321 (1987).
\item 958 F.2d 697 (6th Cir. 1992).
\item Id.
\item Id.
\item Id.; see also Bills, 958 F.2d at 697.
\item See Mapp v. Ohio, 367 U.S. 643 (1961) (holding that evidence seized in violation of the Constitution is inadmissible in court).
\end{itemize}
\end{footnotesize}
actors for violation of her Fourth Amendment right against unreasonable searches and seizures, the remedy obviously must be quite different. In such cases, the admissibility of evidence is not an issue.\textsuperscript{35} The codification of the Civil Rights Act of 1871, 42 U.S.C. § 1983, creates a federal cause of action against state actors who have violated federal law,\textsuperscript{34} while \textit{Bivens} creates an analogous cause of action against federal actors.\textsuperscript{35} In \textit{Layne}, petitioners sought damages from state respondents under § 1983 and from federal respondents under \textit{Bivens}.\textsuperscript{36} Petitioners were not seeking to challenge the admissibility of any evidence. Rather, they were seeking redress in the form of monetary damages for the invasion of their privacy.

Defendants in a § 1983 or a \textit{Bivens} action are, however, entitled to a defense of qualified immunity if the allegedly violated right was not “clearly established” at the time of the violation.\textsuperscript{37} The first recognition by the Supreme Court of this right of qualified immunity for ordinary government employees came in \textit{Harlow v. Fitzgerald}.\textsuperscript{38} The Court held that government officials performing discretionary functions are “shielded from liability for civil damages insofar as their conduct does not violate ‘clearly established’ statutory or constitutional rights of which a reasonable person would have known.”\textsuperscript{39} The Court further refined this standard five years later in \textit{Anderson v. Creighton},\textsuperscript{40} a case in which a homeowner brought an action against an FBI

\begin{itemize}
  \item[$\textsuperscript{35}$] Plaintiffs in such cases do not seek the exclusion of evidence because there is usually no evidence to be excluded. A search can be unreasonable even if it does not result in the production of incriminating evidence.
  \item[$\textsuperscript{34}$] Section 1983 provides:
  \begin{quote}
  Every person ... of a State or Territory or the District of Columbia, subjects, or causes to be subjected, any citizen of the United States or other person within the jurisdiction thereof to the deprivation of any rights, privileges, or immunities secured by the Constitution and laws, shall be liable to the party injured in an action at law, suit in equity, or other proper proceeding for redress. . . .
  \end{quote}
  \item[$\textsuperscript{36}$] \textit{Bivens}, 403 U.S. at 388.
  \item[$\textsuperscript{37}$] \textit{Harlow v. Fitzgerald}, 457 U.S. at 800, 818 (1982).
  \item[$\textsuperscript{38}$] Levy, supra note 13, at 1171 (citing \textit{Harlow}, 457 U.S. at 813).
  \item[$\textsuperscript{39}$] See \textit{Harlow}, 457 U.S. at 818 (plaintiff filed suit against presidential aides alleging the existence of a conspiracy to discharge plaintiff unlawfully from employment in the Department of Air Force).
  \item[$\textsuperscript{40}$] 483 U.S. 635 (1987).
\end{itemize}
agent because of a warrantless search. The Court held that a defense of qualified immunity will fail if the right allegedly vi-o-ated was "clearly established" at the time of the violation such that a reasonable official could have believed that her actions were within the bounds of the law.\textsuperscript{41} However, the Court added:
"[t]his is not to say that an official action is protected by qualified immunity unless the very act in question has been previously held unlawful, but it is to say that in light of preexisting authority the unlawfulness must be apparent."\textsuperscript{42} This holding was reinforced in \textit{United States v. Lanier,}\textsuperscript{43} in which the Court explained that the qualified immunity test is essentially the same as the "fair warning" test in criminal proceedings.\textsuperscript{44} The pur-purpose of the defense is to give the defendant fair warning that his action will result in liability.\textsuperscript{45} However, the Court also explained that fair warning does not necessarily require that a facttually indistinguishable case must have already come before the adjudicating court.\textsuperscript{46} According to the Court, a right that has been defined in general terms can still clearly establish the law.\textsuperscript{47}

\section*{C. QUALIFIED IMMUNITY IN THE CONTEXT OF MEDIA ENTRY INTO HOMES}

Only three federal appellate court cases prior to \textit{Layne} dealt with the question of qualified immunity in the context of media entry into private homes during the execution of a warrant.\textsuperscript{48} In the first case, \textit{Ayeni v. Mottola}, the Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit held that an objectively reasonable officer could not have concluded that inviting a television crew to participate in

\begin{itemize}
\item \textsuperscript{41} \textit{Id.} at 638.
\item \textsuperscript{42} \textit{Id.} at 640.
\item \textsuperscript{43} 520 U.S. 259 (1997).
\item \textsuperscript{44} \textit{Id.} at 265. The "fair warning" test in criminal proceedings requires that courts resolve ambiguity in a criminal statute by applying it only to conduct clearly covered. \textit{Id.}
\item \textsuperscript{45} \textit{Id.} at 270.
\item \textsuperscript{46} \textit{Id.}
\item \textsuperscript{47} \textit{Id.}
\item \textsuperscript{48} Berger v. Hanlon, 129 F.3d 505 (9th Cir. 1997); Parker v. Boyer, 93 F.3d 445 (8th Cir. 1996); Ayeni v. Mottola, 35 F.3d 680 (2d Cir. 1994). The Supreme Court denied certiorari to review the holdings of \textit{Parker} and \textit{Ayeni}, but granted certiorari to review the holding of \textit{Berger}. In \textit{Hanlon v. Berger}, 119 S. Ct. 1706 (1999), which was decided the same day as \textit{Layne}, the Supreme Court held that the officers in \textit{Hanlon} were not entitled to qualified immunity. The Court's brief opinion relied upon its opinion in \textit{Layne}.
\end{itemize}
the search of a home was lawful and that any officer engaging in such conduct was not entitled to qualified immunity. In Ayeni, law enforcement officers entered the apartment of the plaintiff to search for specified evidence of credit card fraud pursuant to a warrant. In doing so, the officers permitted a CBS television crew from "Street Stories," a weekly news magazine program, to enter the home and videotape the search. The court of appeals emphasized the importance of the privacy right protected by the Fourth Amendment and held that "clearly established" law prohibited the conduct of the officers. The court explained that the absence of a prior case that answered the precise question at issue in Ayeni did not necessitate the conclusion that the violated right was not "clearly established." In the second case, Parker v. Boyer, the Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit reached the opposite conclusion in a case involving the entry of a television news crew into a private home during a search for weapons. The court of appeals emphasized that the absence of caselaw precluded a finding that the law was "clearly established" at the time of the violation. The court added that most courts had rejected the argument that a constitutional right is violated when the media enter a home during a search. Finally, in Berger v. Hanlon, which involved similar factual circumstances, the Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit held that the law against media entry into homes during the execution of a warrant was "clearly established" and that officers violating this right were not entitled to qualified immunity.

Turning more specifically to the facts involved in Layne, the parties to the case were able to cite only three cases prior to April 1992, which involved the permissibility of media entry into

---

49 Ayeni, 35 F.3d at 686.
50 Id. at 683.
51 Id.
52 Id. at 686.
53 Id.
54 93 F.3d 445 (8th Cir. 1996).
55 Id. at 447.
56 Id.
57 Id.
58 129 F.3d 505 (9th Cir. 1997).
59 Id. at 511-12.
homes during the execution of a search warrant.\textsuperscript{60} Two of the cases were unpublished and the district courts in each case held that media entry into a home was permissible. However, neither case involved a discussion of the Fourth Amendment question at issue in \textit{Layne}.\textsuperscript{61} The only published decision on point arose out of a state intermediate appellate court which held that members of a news crew did not violate plaintiff's constitutional rights when they entered his home during the execution of a search warrant.\textsuperscript{62} However, the court also held that the law enforcement officers who permitted the news crew to enter plaintiff's home were guilty of trespass.\textsuperscript{63}

Thus, at the time of the alleged violation in \textit{Layne}, no prior case had dealt with the same set of factual circumstances involved in \textit{Layne}.\textsuperscript{64} However, the prior caselaw did demonstrate that the Fourth Amendment prohibited police actions unrelated to the objective of a warrant.\textsuperscript{65}

\textbf{III. FACTS AND PROCEDURAL HISTORY}

\textbf{A. STATEMENT OF FACTS}

In early 1992, the United States Marshals Service established "Operation Gunsmoke," ("Gunsmoke") a nationwide fugitive apprehension program operated in conjunction with state and local law enforcement agencies.\textsuperscript{66} This nationwide program, created to apprehend dangerous criminals, resulted in 3,313 arrests in 40 metropolitan areas.\textsuperscript{67} Pursuant to the program, the Marshals Service entered into a Memorandum of Understand-
One of the targets of the program was Dominic Jerome Wilson, the son of petitioners Charles and Geraldine Wilson. Dominic Wilson had violated his probation on previous convictions of robbery, theft, and assault with intent to rob and was considered by the program's standards to be a violent offender likely to resist arrest. On April 14, 1992, the Circuit Court for Montgomery County, Maryland issued three bench warrants for the arrest of Dominic Wilson, one for each of his probation violations. Each of the warrants was addressed to "any duly authorized peace officer" and was identical aside from mention of the specific probation violation at issue. None of the warrants made any mention of media presence or participation. However, the Marshals Service had earlier adopted a written media "ride-along" policy which contemplated media presence in homes during the execution of a warrant. The policy had been prepared by an employee in the public relations office of the Marshals Service.

Early in the morning of April 16, 1992, Gunsmoke officials assembled a team of United States Marshals and Montgomery County Police officers to raid the home of petitioners in search of Dominic Wilson. The respondent deputy, U.S. Marshal

---

68 Brief for Petitioners at 2, Wilson v. Layne, 119 S. Ct. 1692 (1999) (No. 98-83). The Memorandum stated: "It is agreed that no mention will be made to the press about 'Operation Gunsmoke' until a joint press statement can be prepared at the culmination of the operation." Id.

69 Federal Respondents' Brief at 2, Layne (No. 98-83).

70 Id.

71 Layne, 119 S. Ct. at 1695.

72 Id. at 1695 n.1. For example, one of the warrants read:

The State of Maryland, to any duly authorized peace officer, greeting; you are hereby commanded to take Dominic Jerome Wilson if he/she shall be found in your bailiwick, and have him immediately before the Circuit Court for Montgomery County, now in session, at the Judicial Center, in Rockville, to answer an indictment, or information, or criminal appeals unto the State of Maryland, of and concerning a certain charge of Robbery [Violation of Probation] by him committed, as hath been presented, and so forth. Hereof fail not at your peril, and have you then and there this writ. Witness.

Id.

73 Id. at 1695.

74 Federal Respondents' Brief at 2, Layne (No. 98-83).

75 Layne, 119 S. Ct. at 1704.

76 Petitioners' Brief at 2, Layne (No. 98-83).
Harry Layne, the Washington, D.C. area site supervisor of Gunsmoke, assigned a reporter and photographer from the Washington Post to accompany the Gunsmoke team. Marc Wilson, Dominic Wilson's brother, had informed the law enforcement officers that Dominic Wilson resided with their parents at 909 North Stone Street Avenue in the Lincoln Park neighborhood of Rockville. Thus, at approximately 6:45 A.M., the Gunsmoke team, accompanied by the reporter and photographer from the Washington Post, raided the home at that address.

Charles and Geraldine Wilson, the petitioners, were lying in bed when they heard a loud knocking on their front door. Valencia Snowden, their nine year-old granddaughter, answered the door and was promptly removed by the officers to a safe location. Mr. Wilson called out to Valencia. When she did not respond, Mr. Wilson got out of bed and walked into the living room where he was confronted by three gun-wielding, plain clothes law enforcement officers accompanied by the reporter and photographer from the Washington Post. Mr. Wilson, who was wearing only his underpants, repeatedly cursed the officers and demanded that they explain their presence. He raised his hands in the air and was quickly ordered to the ground by the officers. Mrs. Wilson, who was wearing only a sheer nightgown, entered the room to find her husband face-down on the floor with a police officer's knee in his back and a gun to his head. In response to the officers' questions about the whereabouts of Dominic Wilson, Mr. Wilson told the officers that he was not Dominic, that Dominic did not live there, and that he had not seen Dominic for at least two weeks.

---

71 Id. The record does not make clear the reason for this assignment.
72 Federal Respondents' Brief at 3, Layne (No. 98-83); Layne, 119 S. Ct. at 1696.
73 Petitioners' Brief at 3, Layne (No. 98-83).
74 Id.
75 Federal Respondents' Brief at 3, Layne (No. 98-83); Petitioners' Brief at 3, Layne (No. 98-83).
76 Id.
77 Petitioners' Brief at 3, Layne (No. 98-83).
78 Id. at 3-4.
79 Layne, 119 S. Ct. at 1696.
80 Petitioners' Brief at 4, Layne (No. 98-83).
81 Id. at 4-5.
82 Id. at 4. Mr. Wilson was visibly angry throughout the encounter and repeatedly cursed at the officers.
Wilson confirmed Mr. Wilson’s statements. The reporter and photographer, who took several pictures of the Wilsons, were present in the Wilsons’ home during the entire encounter without their consent. The District Court found that the reporters “were in the house, snooping around, looking around, participating in one fashion or another with both the search of the premises for the individual, who was not found, and the seizure of the Wilsons, who were detained and actually photographed by the photographer.” After determining that Dominic Wilson was not in petitioners’ home, the officers left with the reporter and photographer. At no point during the encounter were the Wilsons permitted to clothe themselves decently. None of the pictures were ever published by the Washington Post.

B. PROCEDURAL HISTORY

Petitioners brought a lawsuit in the District Court of Maryland against the federal law enforcement officers in their personal capacities under Bivens, and against the state law enforcement officers in their personal capacities under 42 U.S.C. § 1983. Petitioners claimed that their rights under the Fourth and Fourteenth Amendments were violated because the officers (1) used excessive force; (2) lacked probable cause to believe that Dominic Wilson would be present at petitioners’ address; and (3) allowed members of the media into their home during the execution of the warrants. The district court granted summary judgment to the respondents on the first two points because the evidence, “when viewed in the light most favorable to petitioners,” demonstrated that the amount of force used was reasonable and that the officers had probable cause to believe that Dominic Wilson would be found in petitioners’

---

88 Id.
89 Id. at 5.
90 Id. at 4-5.
91 Layne, 119 S. Ct. at 1696.
92 Petitioners’ Brief at 5, Layne (No. 98-83).
93 Layne, 119 S. Ct. at 1696.
95 Layne, 119 S.Ct. at 1696.
96 U.S. CoNsT. amend. XIV provides: “No State shall . . . deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law . . . .”
97 Federal Respondents’ Brief at 4, Layne (No. 98-83).
home. The court, however, ruled in petitioners' favor on the third point holding that the actions of the officers in allowing members of the media into the petitioners' home during the execution of a warrant violated petitioners' Fourth Amendment right. Further, the court denied respondents' motion for summary judgment on qualified immunity grounds because, according to the court, at the time of violation in April 1992, the violated Fourth Amendment right was "clearly established." The district court argued that the "core constitutional right" had been "clearly established" despite the absence of a prior factually indistinguishable case.

The respondents brought an interlocutory appeal and, in a 2 to 1 decision, a panel of the Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit reversed the district court's denial of summary judgment for the respondents. The court held that the officers were entitled to a defense of qualified immunity because a reasonable officer could have believed she was not violating any "clearly established" right. The court held that the few cases dealing with the subject precluded a finding that the law was "clearly established." The court, however, declined to decide whether the officers' actions actually constituted a violation of the Fourth Amendment.

The court of appeals granted petitioners' motion for rehearing before an en banc court and reversed the district court in a 6 to 5 decision. Once again the court declined to decide whether there was a violation of the Fourth Amendment but held that the officers were nonetheless entitled to qualified immunity because the officers did not violate any "clearly established" right of petitioners. The majority found that even if it was "clearly established" in April 1992, that the Fourth Amendment prohibited unwarranted third party entry into homes, it could not conclude that the actions of the officers in this case

---

98 Wilson v. Layne, 141 F.3d 111, 113 (4th Cir. 1998) (en banc).
99 Id. at 113-14.
100 Id. at 114.
101 Petitioners' Brief at 63a-64a, Layne (No. 98-83).
102 Wilson v. Layne, 110 F.3d 1071, 1074-76 (4th Cir. 1997).
103 Id. at 1074.
104 Id. at 1075-76.
105 Wilson v. Layne, 141 F.3d 111 (4th Cir. 1998) (en banc).
106 Id. at 118-19
would fall under such a rule. The dissenting opinion, agreeing with the district court, argued that respondents were not entitled to qualified immunity because it had long been "clearly established" that the actions of police officers in the execution of a warrant are strictly limited by the bounds set by the warrant. Furthermore, the dissenting opinion argued that any reasonable officer should have known that the actions at issue in this case would constitute a violation of the Fourth Amendment.

The Supreme Court granted certiorari to the court of appeals on November 9, 1998, limited to the following two questions: "1. Whether law enforcement officers violate the Fourth Amendment by allowing members of the news media to accompany them and to observe and record their execution of a warrant? 2. Whether, if this action violates the Fourth Amendment, the officers are nonetheless entitled to defense of qualified immunity?"

IV. SUMMARY OF OPINIONS

A. THE MAJORITY OPINION

Writing for the majority, Chief Justice Rehnquist affirmed the decision of the Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit and argued in Part II of his opinion that respondents violated the Fourth Amendment when they allowed members of the media to accompany them into petitioners' home during the execution of a warrant. Chief Justice Rehnquist argued in Part III of his opinion that the officers in this case were nonetheless entitled to a defense of qualified immunity because the state of the law on this issue was not "clearly established" in April 1992, when the violation took place. In Part II of the opinion, the Court began by determining that the qualified immunity analysis is identical under either a § 1983 or a Bivens cause of ac-

\[\text{\footnotesize{107 Id. at 115-16.}}\]
\[\text{\footnotesize{108 Id. at 119-20 (Murnaghan, J., dissenting).}}\]
\[\text{\footnotesize{109 Id. at 120 (Murnaghan, J., dissenting).}}\]
\[\text{\footnotesize{111 Wilson v. Layne, 119 S. Ct. 1692, 1698-99 (1999). Part II of Chief Justice Rehnquist's opinion was joined by the other eight Justices.}}\]
\[\text{\footnotesize{112 Id. at 1699-701. Part III of Chief Justice Rehnquist's opinion was joined by Scalia, J., O'Connor, J., Ginsburg, J., Souter, J., Thomas, J., Kennedy, J., and Breyer, J.}}\]
In order to evaluate a defense of qualified immunity, a court must first determine the existence of a constitutional violation, and then proceed to determine whether the violated constitutional right was "clearly established" at the time of the alleged violation.\textsuperscript{114} The purpose of this order of procedure is to "spare a defendant not only unwarranted liability, but unwarranted demands customarily imposed upon those defending a long drawn-out lawsuit."\textsuperscript{115} Another benefit of this order is that it "promotes clarity in the legal standards of both the officers and the general public."\textsuperscript{116}

Thus, the Court first determined whether there had in fact been a violation of the Fourth Amendment.\textsuperscript{117} Chief Justice Rehnquist began with a discussion of the "centuries-old principle of respect for the privacy of the home" which was recognized in England long before the founding of the nation and which was the basis for the Fourth Amendment.\textsuperscript{118} This respect for the sanctity of the home entailed the principle that police cannot enter a home without a warrant.\textsuperscript{119} Furthermore, the scope of the search must not exceed the bounds set by the warrant.\textsuperscript{120} Although this does not mean that every police action must be explicitly authorized by the warrant,\textsuperscript{121} it does mean that every police action must be related to the objectives that justified the issuance of the warrant.\textsuperscript{122}

The Court then held that the presence of the reporter and photographer in the home of petitioners "was not related to the objectives of the authorized intrusion" and was therefore in violation of the Fourth Amendment.\textsuperscript{123} Respondents admitted that the reporters did not assist the police in the execution of the warrant and that the objectives of the intrusion did not necessitate their presence. However, respondents argued that the presence of the reporters in petitioner's home served various important law enforcement purposes. Respondents argued first, that the police should have reasonable discretion to determine the appropriateness of media "ride-alongs." Second, respondents claimed that media presence helps keep the public in touch with police activities. Finally, respondents asserted that media presence could help protect the safety of both homeowners and the police. The Court discussed and dismissed each of these arguments.

First, respondents argued that law enforcement officers should be permitted to exercise reasonable discretion in determining when it would "further their law enforcement mission to permit members of the news media to accompany them in executing a warrant." The Court rejected this claim because it "ignor[ed] the importance of the right of residential privacy" and because it failed to appreciate the distinction between law enforcement objectives generally and the more specific objectives of a search. The Court stated that whether or not media "ride-alongs" further law enforcement objectives generally, it does not follow that they also further the specific objectives of an authorized intrusion into a private home.

Second, the respondents claimed that media presence during the execution of a warrant helps publicize government efforts to combat crime and promotes accurate reporting of police activities. Although the Court noted that some of its First Amendment opinions acknowledge the importance of these objectives, it nonetheless asserted that "the possibility of

\[124\] Id.
\[125\] Id.
\[126\] Id.
\[127\] Id.
\[128\] Id. at 1699.
\[129\] Id.
\[130\] Id. at 1698 (quoting Federal Respondents' Brief at 15, Layne (No. 98-83)).
\[131\] Id.
\[132\] Id.
\[133\] Id.
\[134\] Id.
\[135\] Id. (citing Cox Broadcasting Corp. v. Cohn, 420 U.S. 469, 491-92 (1975); Richmond Newspapers, Inc. v. Virginia, 448 U.S. 555, 572-73 (1980)).
good public relations is simply not enough, standing alone, to justify the 'ride-along' intrusion into a private home.\textsuperscript{136}

Finally, respondents asserted that the presence of the media could help protect the safety of both homeowners and police officers because all parties involved would be hesitant to misbehave in front of the camera.\textsuperscript{137} The Court, however, dismissed this argument because the reporters from the Washington Post were not invited to serve these purposes.\textsuperscript{138} The reporters were present for their own private purposes only.\textsuperscript{139}

Chief Justice Rehnquist then turned to the question of qualified immunity and explained that in order for respondents to be liable, the violated right must have been "clearly established" at the time of the violation:\textsuperscript{140}

"Clearly established" for purposes of qualified immunity means that "[t]he contours of the right must be sufficiently clear that a reasonable official would understand that what he is doing violates that right. This is not to say that an official action is protected by qualified immunity unless the very action in question has previously been held unlawful, but it is to say that in the light of pre-existing law the unlawfulness must be apparent."\textsuperscript{141}

The Court further explained that the allegedly violated right must be established at the "appropriate level of specificity before a court can determine whether it was 'clearly established'" at the time of the violation.\textsuperscript{142} According to the Court, the question in this case was "whether a reasonable officer could have believed that bringing members of the media into a home during the execution of an arrest warrant was lawful, in light of 'clearly established' law and the information the officers possessed."\textsuperscript{143} Using this standard, the Court held that a reasonable officer could have believed that the actions of the officers in this case did not violate any "clearly established" right.\textsuperscript{144}
First, Chief Justice Rehnquist argued that "the constitutional question is by no means open and shut" and that "accurate media coverage of police activities serves an important public purpose." Thus, the Court found that the general principles of the Fourth Amendment did not make it obvious that the officers in this case behaved unreasonably.

Second, the majority argued that at the time of the violation, the caselaw did not clearly establish that the common practice of allowing members of the media to "ride along" violated the Fourth Amendment. The only published decision directly on point held that such conduct was not unreasonable, while the two unpublished decisions cited by the parties upheld searches involving media entry into homes based upon non-Fourth Amendment analyses. The Court rejected petitioners' reliance upon Bills v. Aseltine for the proposition that police may not allow third parties to enter a home during the execution of a warrant unless third party assistance is required. First, Bills was decided only five weeks before the events in Layne, and second, Bills arose out of a different jurisdiction, and thus could not clearly establish the question at issue here. The Court then pointed out that petitioners had neither cited any controlling authority in their jurisdiction, nor identified a consensus of persuasive authority sufficient to show that the violated law in this case was "clearly established" in April 1992.

Finally, the majority emphasized the importance of the reliance by the United States Marshals on the media "ride-along policy which explicitly contemplated that media who engaged in ride-alongs might enter private homes with their cameras as part of fugitive apprehension arrests." According to the Court, in light of the fact that the caselaw on the subject was unclear, it

145 Id.
146 Id.
147 Id. (citing Bills v. Aseltine, 958 F.2d 697 (6th Cir. 1992)).
148 Id.
149 Id. (citing Bills v. Aseltine, 958 F.2d 697 (6th Cir. 1992)).
150 Id.
151 Id. (citing Bills v. Aseltine, 958 F.2d 697 (6th Cir. 1992)).
152 Id.
153 Id.
154 Id.
was reasonable for officers to rely upon their media “ride-along” policy.\textsuperscript{155}

B. JUSTICE STEVENS’ CONCURRENCE AND DISSENT

Justice Stevens concurred with the majority that the officers violated the Fourth Amendment in bringing the reporters from the Washington Post into petitioners’ home.\textsuperscript{156} However, he dissented from the majority holding that the officers in this case were entitled to a defense of qualified immunity on the grounds that the violated law was “clearly established” in April 1992.\textsuperscript{157}

The clarity of the constitutional rule, a federal statute (18 U.S.C. § 3105), common-law decisions, and the testimony of the senior law enforcement officer all support my position that it has long been clearly established that officers may not bring third parties into private homes to witness the execution of a warrant.\textsuperscript{158}

Justice Stevens pointed out that the Court’s holding that the Fourth Amendment was violated was in agreement with the holdings of every federal appellate court judge who had addressed the same question.\textsuperscript{159} Thus, he asserted that any reasonable officer should have known that the actions involved in this case violated “clearly established” law.\textsuperscript{160} He went on to argue that the absence of judicial opinions expressly holding that the actions of the respondents violated the Fourth Amendment did not show that the law was not “clearly established.”\textsuperscript{161} According to Justice Stevens, “[t]he easiest cases don’t even even arise.”\textsuperscript{162} Furthermore, while the practice of media “ride-alongs” may have been common, Justice Stevens pointed out that this did not mean that the practice of allowing third parties into homes during the execution of a warrant was common.\textsuperscript{163} The case cited by the majority involved the practice of firefighters allowing \textsuperscript{155} Id. at 1701.

\textsuperscript{156} Id. (Stevens, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part). No other Justices joined in the opinion.

\textsuperscript{157} Id. (Stevens, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part).

\textsuperscript{158} Id. (Stevens, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part).

\textsuperscript{159} Id. at 1702 (Stevens, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part).

\textsuperscript{160} Id. (Stevens, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part).

\textsuperscript{161} Id. (Stevens, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part).

\textsuperscript{162} Id. at 1701 (Stevens, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) (quoting United States v. Lanier, 520 U.S. 259, 271 (1997)).

\textsuperscript{163} Id. at 1702 (Stevens, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part).
photographers into disaster areas and involved the doctrine of implied consent, a doctrine inapplicable to this case.164

Justice Stevens next claimed that the three main cases discussed by the majority could not support its holding.165 The two federal decisions did not even address the Fourth Amendment question and were, moreover, unpublished.166 Furthermore, although the one published decision held that the media’s actions in filming and broadcasting a reasonable search and seizure were not unreasonable, Justice Stevens emphasized that the court also held that the officers in that case committed a trespass by allowing third parties to enter the plaintiff’s home.167

As further support for his argument that a reasonable officer should have known that the law violated in this case was “clearly established,” Justice Stevens pointed to the understanding of the police themselves.168 The Sheriff of Montgomery County, the commanding officer of three of the respondents stated: “We would never let a civilian into a home . . . . That’s just not allowed.”169

Finally, Justice Stevens strongly criticized the majority’s reliance upon the media “ride-along” policy.170 The policy contained very little direction in how and when members of the media may enter a private home and “[t]he notion that any member of that well-trained cadre of professionals would rely on such a document for guidance in the performance of dangerous law enforcement assignments is too farfetched to merit serious consideration.”171 According to Justice Stevens, the policy was intended to serve as propaganda to bolster the image of 164 Id. at 1702-03 (Stevens, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) (citing Florida Publ’g Co. v. Fletcher, 340 So.2d 914, 918 (Fla. 1976)). The doctrine of implied consent is based on the premise that consent can be presumed in the presence of certain circumstances, even if explicit verbal or written consent is absent. BLACK’S LAW DICTIONARY 305 (6th ed. 1990).

165 Layne, 119 S. Ct. at 1703 (Stevens, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part).
166 Id. (Stevens, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part).
167 Id. at 1703 n.6 (Stevens, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) (citing Prahl v. Brosamle, 295 N.W.2d 768, 782 (Wis. Ct. App. 1980)).
168 Id. at 1704 (Stevens, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part).
169 Id. (Stevens, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) (quoting Petitioners’ Brief at 41, Layne (No. 98-83)).
170 Id. at 1704 (Stevens, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part).
171 Id. (Stevens, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part).
law enforcement, and not as a guide for the conduct of police officers.\textsuperscript{122}

V. ANALYSIS

A. THE LAW ENFORCEMENT OFFICERS VIOLATED THE FOURTH AMENDMENT

The Supreme Court correctly concluded that the Fourth Amendment's protection against unreasonable searches and seizures prohibits law enforcement officers from allowing the media to enter a home during the execution of a search warrant.\textsuperscript{173} The unanimous opinion, authored by Chief Justice Rehnquist, properly emphasized that the notion of the home as a person's castle, the one sure place to which a person may retreat from the outside world, has been an important part of the American legal tradition since the founding of the nation.\textsuperscript{174} The Fourth Amendment was written in order to preserve the overriding importance of the privacy of the home\textsuperscript{175} and the Supreme Court has expounded upon the importance of the Fourth Amendment and the sanctity of the home in countless opinions.\textsuperscript{176} \textit{Layne} should therefore, be analyzed within this context and tradition.

Although the Court has never previously decided a case involving media entry into homes during the execution of a warrant, it has clearly held in several cases that the Fourth Amendment prohibits officers executing a warrant from performing actions unrelated to the objectives of the warrant.\textsuperscript{177} Furthermore, 18 U.S.C. § 3105 permits execution of a search warrant only by authorized officers or any person required to aid the authorized officers.\textsuperscript{178} In \textit{Layne}, the law enforcement of-

\textsuperscript{122} \textit{Id.} (Stevens, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part).
\textsuperscript{173} \textit{Id.} at 1699.
\textsuperscript{174} \textit{Id.} at 1697.
\textsuperscript{175} \textit{Id.}
ficers admitted that the reporter and photographer from the Washington Post were not present in the petitioners' home to aid the officers and did not participate in the execution of the warrant. The three arguments of respondents regarding the benefits of media involvement are too general to be taken seriously in this context. While media presence during the execution of a search warrant may serve certain important functions, assisting police in the execution of a warrant is not among them. Also, the three warrants made no mention of media involvement. Thus, by permitting the media to enter petitioners' home, the officers were performing actions unrelated to the objectives of the authorized intrusion.

One of the most important functions served by a warrant is to ensure that an intrusion into a private home is strictly necessary. Thus, warrants not only specify who may perform the search, but also what area may be searched, and what may be searched for. This function, however, is undermined when officers stray outside the boundaries set by the warrant by performing actions unrelated to the objectives of the authorized intrusion. The Fourth Amendment protection is weakened if police are not bound by the terms of the warrant. One need not look any further than the case at issue for a specific example of the kind of harm likely to result from police action unauthorized by a warrant. As if the encounter was not humiliating enough, the Wilsons were forced to submit to the presence of two additional strangers in their living room. One of these strangers was busy scribbling notes while the other was snapping photographs of the half-naked couple. If the Fourth Amend-

---

179 Petitioners' Brief at 5, Layne (No. 98-83).
180 Layne, 119 S. Ct. at 1698-99.
181 Id.
182 Petitioners' Brief at 3, Layne (No. 98-83).
183 Layne, 119 S. Ct. at 1698-99.
184 LAFAVE & ISRAEL, supra note 15, § 3.3(a), at 138.
185 Id. § 3.4(e)-(f); see also 18 U.S.C. § 3105 (1994).
187 Horton, 496 U.S. 128; Hicks, 480 U.S. 321; Bivens, 403 U.S. 388.
188 Layne, 119 S. Ct. 1692.
189 Petitioners' Brief at 5, Layne (No. 98-83).
190 Id.
ment truly protects the privacy of the home and prohibits warrantless police action, it is difficult to imagine circumstances more in violation of the amendment than what occurred in the Wilson home. 191

The unanimous Court correctly dismissed respondents' arguments that media presence during the execution of a warrant serves a number of important and socially valuable purposes. 192 The determination of whether police violated the Fourth Amendment while executing a warrant does not turn on whether or not the police actions were beneficial. 193 Rather, a court must look to the relevant caselaw and to the general principles of the Fourth Amendment. 194 In this instance, both demonstrate that regardless of the benefits of media presence, the Fourth Amendment simply does not permit police actions unrelated to the objectives of the warrant. 195 Because the actions of the officers in Layne were unrelated to the objectives of the warrant, the Supreme Court was correct in holding that they violated petitioners' Fourth Amendment rights. 196

Despite the concerns of fans of police-drama television shows (e.g., Cops and L.A.P.D.), such shows will most likely not be affected by the Court's ruling in Layne. 197 According to John Langley, executive producer of the Fox program "COPS," his television show should remain "unaffected by the decision because we obtain releases from everyone involved in our program. Moreover, we do not, under any circumstances, violate rights of privacy." 198 Mr. Langley's statement is correct insofar as it applies to the instances not involving surprise raids into private homes. 199 Receiving consent to broadcast a person's image after the unannounced and unwarranted intrusion into a home

191 Layne, 119 S. Ct. at 1696.
192 Id. at 1698-99.
193 Id.
194 Id.
196 Layne, 119 S. Ct. at 1699.
198 Id.
199 Layne, 119 S. Ct. at 1692.
could not retroactively erase a Fourth Amendment violation.\textsuperscript{200} Regardless of whether the homeowners’ image is published, police violate the Fourth Amendment when they allow members of the media to accompany them into a private home.\textsuperscript{201}

B. QUALIFIED IMMUNITY SHOULD NOT HAVE BEEN GRANTED

The officers in \textit{Layne} were not entitled to a defense of qualified immunity.\textsuperscript{202} In holding that the officers were entitled to such a defense, the Court implicitly rejected important portions of the holdings of two of its previous cases, one of which was decided only two years prior to \textit{Layne}.\textsuperscript{203} In both \textit{Anderson v. Creighton} and \textit{United States v. Lanier}, the Court held that a right can be “clearly established” even in the absence of a prior factually indistinguishable case holding the conduct at issue unlawful.\textsuperscript{204} Although no court prior to April 1992, held that officers violate the Fourth Amendment when they allow the media into a home during the execution of a warrant, the Supreme Court had held on several occasions that the actions of officers in the execution of a warrant must be related to the objectives of the warrant.\textsuperscript{205} Thus, it should have been clear to a reasonable officer in April 1992, that allowing members of the media to enter a home during the execution of a warrant violated the Fourth Amendment when such actions were unrelated to the objectives of the authorized intrusion.\textsuperscript{206} The majority improperly focused its analysis on the scant caselaw involving media intrusion into the home\textsuperscript{207} and the result was an analysis of cases that did not even \textsuperscript{200} Id.

\textsuperscript{201} Id. In any event, according to Mr. Langley, “Most of what we show happens on the street or in cars.” \textit{Media "Ride-Along" Breach Privacy Rights, FACTS ON FILE WORLD NEWS DIGEST}, June 3, 1999, at 397, B3.
\textsuperscript{202} See \textit{Layne}, 119 S. Ct. at 1701-04.
\textsuperscript{204} \textit{Lanier}, 520 U.S. at 271; \textit{Anderson}, 483 U.S. at 635. See \textit{supra} notes 40-46 and accompanying text.
\textsuperscript{206} \textit{Horton v. California}, 496 U.S. 128 (1990); \textit{Hicks}, 480 U.S. at 321; \textit{Bivens}, 403 U.S. at 388.
\textsuperscript{207} See \textit{Layne}, 119 S. Ct. at 1700.
address the Fourth Amendment question involved here.\textsuperscript{208} Although the three cases cited by the majority did involve media entry into homes,\textsuperscript{209} the two unpublished decisions did not cite to a single Fourth Amendment search and seizure case while the holding of the one published decision did not even involve the question of police liability.\textsuperscript{210} As pointed out by the dissent, the absence of caselaw specifically addressing the question involved in \textit{Layne} does not show that the violated right had not been "clearly established."\textsuperscript{211} The clearest cases of Fourth Amendment violations typically do not need to be adjudicated.\textsuperscript{212} If the Court had focused on the more general right limiting police action to the objectives of a warrant, it would have been clear that the officers in \textit{Layne} violated this "clearly established" right.\textsuperscript{213} By allowing members of the media to enter the Wilsons' home, the officers performed actions completely unrelated to the objectives of the warrant.\textsuperscript{214} Thus, they should have realized that their unauthorized actions violated the Wilsons' Fourth Amendment rights.\textsuperscript{215}

Additionally, the officers' understanding of the law is an appropriate place to look when determining whether a reasonable officer could have believed that the police conduct in \textit{Layne} did not violate the Fourth Amendment.\textsuperscript{216} The Sheriff of Montgomery County, the commanding officer for three of the respondents, clearly stated that third parties are never allowed into a home.\textsuperscript{217} A reasonable officer, therefore, could not have \textsuperscript{208} See id. The two unpublished district court opinions, \textit{Moncrief v. Hanton} and \textit{Higbee v. Times-Advocate}, did not even address the Fourth Amendment. 10 Media L. Rptr. 1620 (N.D. Ohio 1984); 5 Media L. Rptr. 2372 (S.D. Cal. 1980). The Fourth Amendment issue in \textit{Prahl v. Brosamle} involved a claim against the newscaster and not against the police. 295 N.W.2d 768 (Wis. Ct. App. 1980).

\textsuperscript{209} See supra notes 60-62, 149-50, 165-67 and accompanying text.

\textsuperscript{210} Petitioners' Brief at 42-43, \textit{Layne} (No. 98-83).

\textsuperscript{211} \textit{Layne}, 119 S. Ct. at 1702 (Stevens, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part).

\textsuperscript{212} Id. (Stevens, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part).

\textsuperscript{214} Horton, 496 U.S. 128; Hicks, 480 U.S. 321; Bivens, 403 U.S. 388.

\textsuperscript{215} \textit{Layne}, 119 S. Ct. at 1704 (Stevens, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part).

\textsuperscript{216} Petitioners' Brief at 41, \textit{Layne} (No. 98-83).
believed that the actions of the officers in Layne were permissible.\textsuperscript{218}

The majority, nevertheless, emphasized the significance of the media "ride-along" policy which contemplated the presence of the media in private homes during the execution of warrants.\textsuperscript{219} This emphasis, however, was misguided because testimony of the respondents revealed that they were unaware of the policy.\textsuperscript{220} Also, as argued by the dissent, the policy contained very little direction as to how and when members of the media may enter a private home.\textsuperscript{221} This is unsurprising in view of the strong probability that the policy was written as a public relations tool designed to improve the image of the Marshals Service.\textsuperscript{222} Thus, the idea that law enforcement officers would rely upon such an undetailed policy is simply unbelievable.\textsuperscript{223} In any event, reliance upon the media "ride-along" policy would have directly contradicted the Memorandum of Understanding between the United States Marshals Service and the Montgomery County (Md.) Sheriff's Office which specifically provided that the press were not to be informed of "Operation Gunsmoke" until its culmination.\textsuperscript{224} The Marshals Service could not have entered an agreement which specifically ruled out the possibility of media involvement if it was at the same time relying upon a policy that contemplated media involvement.

Finally, it is important to note that two of the three federal appellate courts that addressed the same questions before the Court in Layne held that law enforcement officers violate the Fourth Amendment when they allow members of the media to enter a private home during the execution of a warrant.\textsuperscript{225} They also held that officers violating this right are not entitled to a defense of qualified immunity because this right has been \textsuperscript{218} Id.

\textsuperscript{219} Layne, 119 S. Ct. at 1700-01.

\textsuperscript{220} Petitioners' Brief at 45, Layne (No. 98-83).

\textsuperscript{221} Layne, 119 S. Ct. at 1704 (Stevens, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part).

\textsuperscript{222} Id. (Stevens, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part).

\textsuperscript{223} Id. (Stevens, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part).

\textsuperscript{224} Petitioners' Brief at 2, Layne (No. 98-83). ("The memorandum provided: 'It is agreed that no mention will be made to the press about 'Operation Gunsmoke' until a joint press statement can be prepared at the culmination of the operation.'").

\textsuperscript{225} Ayeni v. Mottola, 35 F.3d 680 (2d. Cir. 1994); Berger v. Hanlon, 129 F.3d 505 (9th Cir. 1997).
"clearly established." Both courts focused on the importance of the Fourth Amendment's protection of the privacy of the home and the caselaw demonstrating that police officers cannot perform actions unrelated to the objectives of a search warrant.

The Supreme Court erroneously held that the police officers in Layne were entitled to a defense of qualified immunity. At the time of the violation, "clearly established" law prohibited police action unrelated to the objectives of a search warrant. In Layne, the officers violated this "clearly established" law when they allowed police officers to accompany them into the Wilsons' home.

VI. CONCLUSION

In a unanimous decision, the Supreme Court properly held that law enforcement officers violate the Fourth Amendment when they allow members of the media to enter a private home during the execution of a warrant. The historical importance of the Fourth Amendment's protection of the privacy of the home and the Court's past decisions holding that law enforcement officers must perform only those actions related to the objectives of an authorized intrusion commanded this result.

However, the Court incorrectly held that the officers in Layne were nonetheless entitled to qualified immunity because, according to the majority, the violated right was not "clearly established" at the time of the violation. First, the Court ignored its previous holdings that a right can be "clearly established" even in the absence of a prior factually indistinguishable case holding the conduct at issue unlawful. Second, testimony of the respondents made apparent their knowledge.

---

226 Ayeni, 35 F.3d 680; Berger, 129 F.3d 505.
227 Ayeni, 35 F.3d 680; Berger, 129 F.3d 505.
228 Layne, 119 S. Ct. at 1692.
230 Layne, 119 S. Ct. at 1692.
231 Id.
232 Id.
that civilian entry into homes is simply "not allowed." Finally, two of the three federal appellate courts that decided this same question of qualified immunity came to the opposite conclusion that the majority came to in Layne.

Brian H. Chun

---

124 Petitioners' Brief at 41, Layne (No. 98-83).

125 Ayeni v. Mottola, 35 F.3d 680 (2d Cir. 1994); Berger v. Hanlon, 129 F.3d 505 (9th Cir. 1997).